ABSTRACT

Information is presented on student default rates at 7,800 postsecondary schools. The report builds on previous data and offers a summary analysis of the approximately 1.2 million 1983 borrowers' rates of default by kinds of schools that borrowers and defaulters attended and length in years of their schools' academic programs. Information is provided for each school on default rate, the number of borrowers in default, and the total dollar value of loans in default. Survey findings include the following: four-year public and private school borrowers had the lowest percentage of loans in default, and two-year public and proprietary schools had the highest percentages of loan default; four-year private and public school students had the lowest percentage of dollars in default and two-year public and proprietary school students had the highest percentage of dollars in default; over 1200 schools had default rates greater than 40%; and about half of the schools having a default rate greater than 40% also had fewer than 25 defaulters. The appendixes include a table showing the school default rates for 1983 borrowers (ranking each of the 7,800 schools in descending order by its students' rate of default). Figures are included. In September 1988, we met with staff members of your respective offices. We discussed the preliminary results of our analysis of school default rates for institutions participating in the Stafford Student Loan Program.[1] You had requested information on which schools might be affected by proposed legislative changes that would have established school default rate thresholds and required that schools exceeding these thresholds prepare default management plans and agreements to reduce their defaults. Such proposals were included in Senate bill 2647 and House bill 4986.

Subsequently, we provided each of your offices with a listing of schools that might have been affected by the proposed legislative criteria. We included information for each school on its (1) default rate, (2) the number of borrowers in default, and (3) the total dollar value of loans in default. We developed this information using the Department of Education's latest cumulative computerized data base on the status of student loans made through September 30, 1987. The list we previously provided the Senate subcommittee staff contained about 750 schools having a 25-percent or higher default rate. We also provided the House subcommittee staff a list of approximately 1,300 schools having a default rate of 12-percent or higher. Each school on both lists had a minimum of 100 borrowers who had their last loan guaranteed in 1983 and who subsequently defaulted by September 30, 1987.

[1]We defined the school default rate as cumulative loans disbursed to defaulters attending that school divided by the cumulative loans disbursed to all borrowers who attended that school.

This report builds on the information we previously provided and presents a summary analysis of the approximately 1.2 million 1983 borrowers' rates of default by the (1) kinds of schools attended (public, private, or proprietary) and (2) length in years of their schools' academic programs. We categorized these borrowers into school groups using additional information provided to us by the Department, which is unavailable from the computerized data base. (See pp. 9-13 for a detailed explanation of our objective, scope, and methodology.)

Also included, as requested by your offices, is a list of all of the approximately 7,800 schools and their students' rates of default (see app. I), which we used in performing this analysis. Appendix I ranks each school in descending order by its students' rate of default.

Analysis of the Kind of Schools That Borrowers and Defaulters Attended

For this report, we categorized the schools that borrowers attended into five groups based on the kind of school attended and their typical academic programs' length: 2-years or less (public), 2-years or less (private), 4-years or more (public), 4-years or more (private), and proprietary schools. Examples of what we found included the following.

- Four-year public and private school borrowers had the lowest percentage of loans in default (10 percent each) and 2-year public and proprietary school borrowers had the highest percentage of loans in default (25 and 39 percent, respectively). (See p. 15.)
- Four-year private and public school students had the lowest percentage of dollars in default (8 and 9 percent, respectively) and 2-year public and proprietary school students had the highest percentage of dollars in default (21 and 34 percent, respectively). (See p. 18.)

Analysis of Borrower Default Rates at Each School

Appendix I lists the schools included in our analysis. After providing your offices with preliminary information in September 1988, we agreed to provide for each school its (1) name and location, (2) borrowers' rate of default in descending order, (3) dollar amount of loans in default, and (4) number of defaulters.

We also agreed to list all schools in our universe having at least one borrower. Consequently, it should be noted that for these statistics to be useful, schools with high rates of defaults among their students must also have some minimal threshold of student-borrowers before their rates can be considered meaningful. Relatedly, default management efforts by the Department, guaranty agencies, or the schools themselves could be expected to yield greater default reduction improvements for schools with both relatively high rates of defaults among their students and significant numbers of defaulters than for schools with fewer defaulters.

Appendix I shows school default rates for borrowers who had their last loan guaranteed in 1983. Our analysis showed that over 1,200 schools had default rates greater than 40 percent. (See page 20.) However, about half of those schools having a student default rate greater than 40 percent also had less than 25 defaulters. (See p. 21.)

We believe these default statistics give a reasonable measure of the comparative default experiences of students at various schools while avoiding an important possibility of bias in default rates calculated on a single year's data. This bias could occur if, for example, borrowers from one kind of school default more quickly or more slowly after they leave school than do those at other schools.

The accuracy of the Department's data base may also affect the precision of the default rates shown, but the information we have developed should give the Congress an idea of which schools could be more closely monitored based on their students' default rates.

Additional information—which is unavailable in this data base—could be used to analyze and explain default rate differences among various subgroups of borrowers. Such information includes (1) whether students are admitted on their "ability-to-benefit" (as defined by schools in accordance with the Department's regulations) as opposed to a high school diploma or its equivalent and (2) students' employment status. These factors could be taken into account in setting goals for any school-specific default management plans. However, such considerations were beyond the scope of this effort.

Information on Some Schools Needs Follow Up

In conducting our analysis we found instances in which the data base showed where students attended schools that (1) were never eligible for the program, (2) had ceased operations or were terminated from the program before 1983, or (3) had an invalid identification number so that we were unable to determine the school's name and address (these schools' names and addresses are shown as unknown in app. I). Department of Education officials have helped us throughout this analysis in our efforts to purge the data base of incomplete records. And we have agreed to provide them with a detailed listing of the students who attended these schools so that the Department can follow up with the appropriate guaranty agencies to correct entries in its data base and determine whether fraud was involved in any of these instances. This information will be provided separately to the Department.

As agreed with your offices, we did not obtain formal agency comments. We did, however, discuss the contents of this report with Department of Education program officials and they believed that we had properly noted any potential data limitations.

We are sending copies of this report to other congressional committees, the Department of Education, and other interested parties. Should you wish to discuss the information provided, please call me on 275-5365. The major contributors to this report are listed in appendix II.

Guaranteed Student Loans: Analysis of Student Default Rates at 7,800 Postsecondary Schools

Background

Cumulative loans guaranteed from the inception of the Stafford Student Loan Program in 1965 have totaled over $89 billion through fiscal year 1988, with the loan volume[1] more than doubling since 1983. During the 1983-88 period, cumulative defaulted student loans more than tripled to $8.6 billion. In fiscal year 1988, the Congress and the Department of Education developed several proposals to address the default problem, including specific steps for reducing defaults among students attending schools with particularly high default rates.

Proposals Initiated to Address Default Issues
• Senate bill 2647
• House bill 4986
• Department of Education draft regulations

[1]Loan volume as used by the Department of Education in this report reflects the commitments guaranty agencies made to guarantee loans; actual loans disbursed may be less.

Senate bill 2647 would have required default management plans for schools, as well as for guaranty agencies and lenders with default rates greater than 25 percent in accordance with the bill's provisions. Each school meeting these criteria would be required to develop and implement such a plan with the designated guaranty agency for the state in which the school is located. (Schools with less than 25 defaulted loans would be exempt from this requirement.)

This bill would have also required default reviews by the guaranty agencies at schools meeting certain default dollar thresholds. The results of these reviews would determine if the schools' default management practices substantially contributed to the high dollar value of defaults. If so, such schools would be required to develop and implement a default management plan.

House bill 4986 would have required default reviews by the Department of Education at schools that fall in the top 5 percent of all schools ranked by their (1) default rates as defined by the bill, excluding schools with less than 100 loans outstanding and (2) annual dollars in default, excluding schools whose annual default rate was less than the average national cumulative default rate of all institutions. The results of these reviews could then be used to determine the need for a default reduction agreement.

Neither bill was enacted during the 100th Congress. Senate bill 2647 was reintroduced with minor modifications in the 101st Congress as Senate bill 568, and passed the Senate on March 17, 1989. As of June 16, 1989, the House had yet to reintroduce a bill in the 101st Congress, but the Department issued its final default regulations on June 5, 1989.

Objective, Scope, and Methodology

The objective of this review was to provide information on which schools might have been affected by enactment of Senate bill 2647 and House bill 4986. We conducted our analysis using a data file developed from our study of guaranty agencies' activities required by section 1311 of the Higher Education Amendments of 1986. The principal data source was the Department of Education's latest cumulative computerized data on the status of student loans—commonly referred to as the "tape dump"—as of September 30, 1987.

The method we used to calculate school default rates differs somewhat from those contained in the Senate and House bills, and the Department's regulations. The bills compute a default rate using comparative dollar values for borrowers who had defaulted within certain periods of time. The Department's method is similar to ours and uses the number of borrowers, rather than loan amounts in computing default rates.

Our analysis is based on approximately 1,270,000 borrowers who had their last loan guaranteed in academic year 1983. These borrowers had received cumulative loans of over $5 billion. We used the 1983 loans because (1) these data were being used in other work we had underway and (2) these loans are old enough so that most defaults that are going to occur probably have already occurred. We calculated school default rate statistics by dividing (1) the number of borrowers attending each school who had their last loan guaranteed in 1983 and who defaulted by September 30, 1987, by (2) the total number of 1983 borrowers attending that school who had their last loan guaranteed in 1983. We computed total default dollars for each school by adding the cumulative loans disbursed to each 1983 borrower who attended that school and had defaulted by September 30, 1987.

In addition to the information on the tape dump, the Department also provided us with information from another automated system on the (1) schools' names and addresses, (2) kind of institution (public, private nonprofit, proprietary, or foreign), and (3) schools' length of curriculum (e.g., 1-year, 2-year). This allowed us to characterize each borrower's institution. For example, a borrower who attended a community college would generally be grouped with borrowers attending 2-year public schools.

We classified the schools into the following five groups as shown in figure 2. Although the Department classified schools with 3-year curriculums, the number of such schools was small and we grouped them with our 2-year or less categories.

Kinds of Schools Borrowers Attended
• 2-years or less public
• 2-years or less private
• 4-years or more public
• 4-years or more private
• Proprietary

We excluded from figures 3 through 8—which compare the various school groups—information on 51,000 borrowers whose schools we were unable to classify into one of our five groups. Included in these 51,000 borrowers were students who attended foreign schools, which we excluded because less than 1 percent of the 1983 borrowers in our universe attended such schools. However, we included those borrowers (among the 51,000) from schools we could identify, but not by school group, in our analysis of school default rates shown in appendix I.

Limitations Attributed to the Data Base

The tape dump is generated from records prepared by guaranty agencies and submitted to the Department of Education at the end of each fiscal year. These records include loan amount; loan status; and borrower characteristics, such as age and family income at the time of loan application, for all loans made since the program began. We made no attempt to verify the guaranty agencies' data submissions given the huge size of the data base (over 16 million records), and know of at least one instance in which it may be inaccurate. For example, we know that from our previous work the guaranty agency for New York purged about 230,000 records in 1987. These records were for loans which were paid in full or in default. As a result, the default rates for schools whose loans were guaranteed by the New York agency—presumedly mostly for New York schools—may be understated.

The data base is organized by loan, rather than student record, so a student receiving loans from more than one lender would have separate records for each lender. We excluded such students (approximately 2 percent of our universe) from our analysis because there was no way we could determine whether these students were receiving more than one loan for the same period of enrollment or whether the data were erroneously entered in the data base.

The data base also only lists one school for each borrower record. As a result, defaulted loans of students who attended several schools—but received loans from only one lender—are shown in the default rates of the school most recently attended as recorded in the file. Our universe of approximately 1,270,000 1983 borrowers attended 7,849 schools.

The tape dump is the only nationwide data base containing information on borrower characteristics. But it has certain limitations. For example, it lacks information on payments made by borrowers before or after defaulting. Therefore, for purposes of this analysis, we were unable to determine if defaulters made any payments before or after defaulting and had to use the cumulative amount disbursed as the default amount. Consequently the borrowers default rates we calculated are probably somewhat higher than rates that one could calculate using dollar losses, after adjusting for repayments.

Recognizing that this data base is often incomplete and perhaps inaccurate, we performed a variety of tests to identify certain obvious internal inconsistencies. We then excluded data on individual students if, in our judgment, they were unreliable. Thus, when computing school default rates we eliminated borrowers who, according to records in the data base

- had multiple loan records,
- had a missing or unknown loan status,
- received no loan disbursements,
- received cumulative disbursements greater than the loan amount guaranteed, or
- received approved cumulative loans of less than $100.

After eliminating borrowers with any of these five characteristics, our universe of borrowers was reduced by about 70,000 to approximately 1.2 million. Excluding these borrowers also reduced the number of schools in our analysis by 80, leaving 7,769. Figures 3 through 10, as well as appendix I, reflect the results of this analysis.

Our review was conducted in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards between June and December 1988.

Kinds of Schools That Borrowers and Defaulters Attended

We analyzed several factors concerning what kind of schools that our universe of 1983 borrowers and defaulters attended. We compared the (1) number of borrowers and defaulters and (2) amount of loan dollars received and loan dollars in default.

We found that 4-year public schools had the highest percentage of borrowers (36 percent) and 2-year private schools had the lowest percentage of borrowers (4 percent). (See fig. 3.)

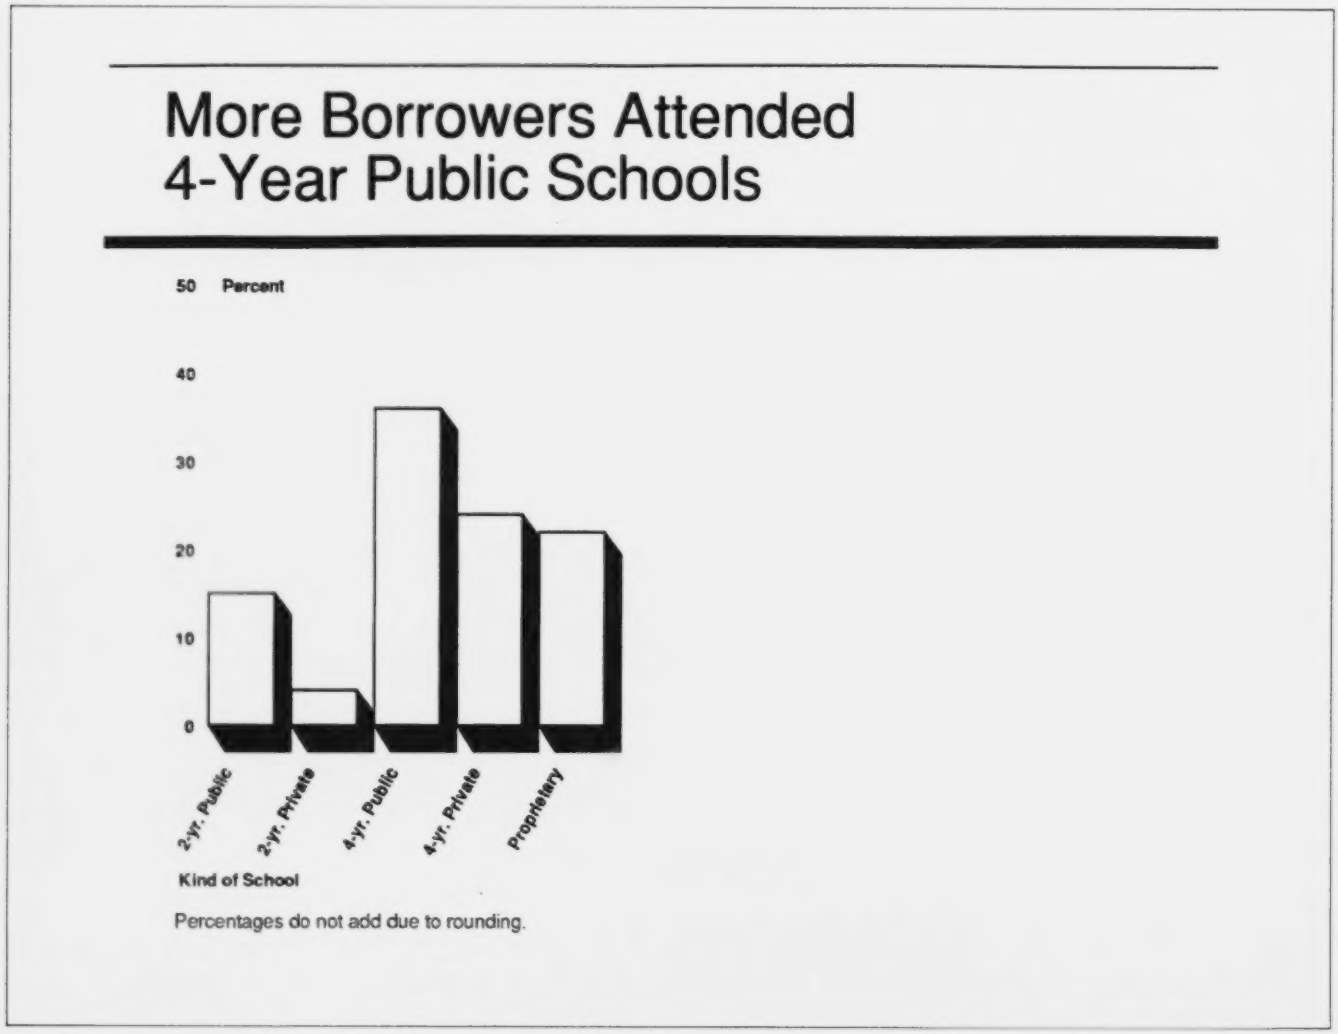

Figure 4 shows that 4-year public and private schools had the lowest borrower default rates (10 percent) and 2-year public and proprietary school borrowers had the highest borrower default rates (25 and 39 percent, respectively).

Figure 4:

• 2-year public: 25 %
• 2-year private: 20 %
• 4-year public: 10 %
• 4-year private: 10 %
• Proproprietary: 39 %

Figure 5 shows that 2-year public and proprietary school borrowers had a greater proportion of total borrowers in our universe who were in default (19 and 44 percent, respectively), when compared to their proportion of total borrowers (15 and 22 percent, respectively).

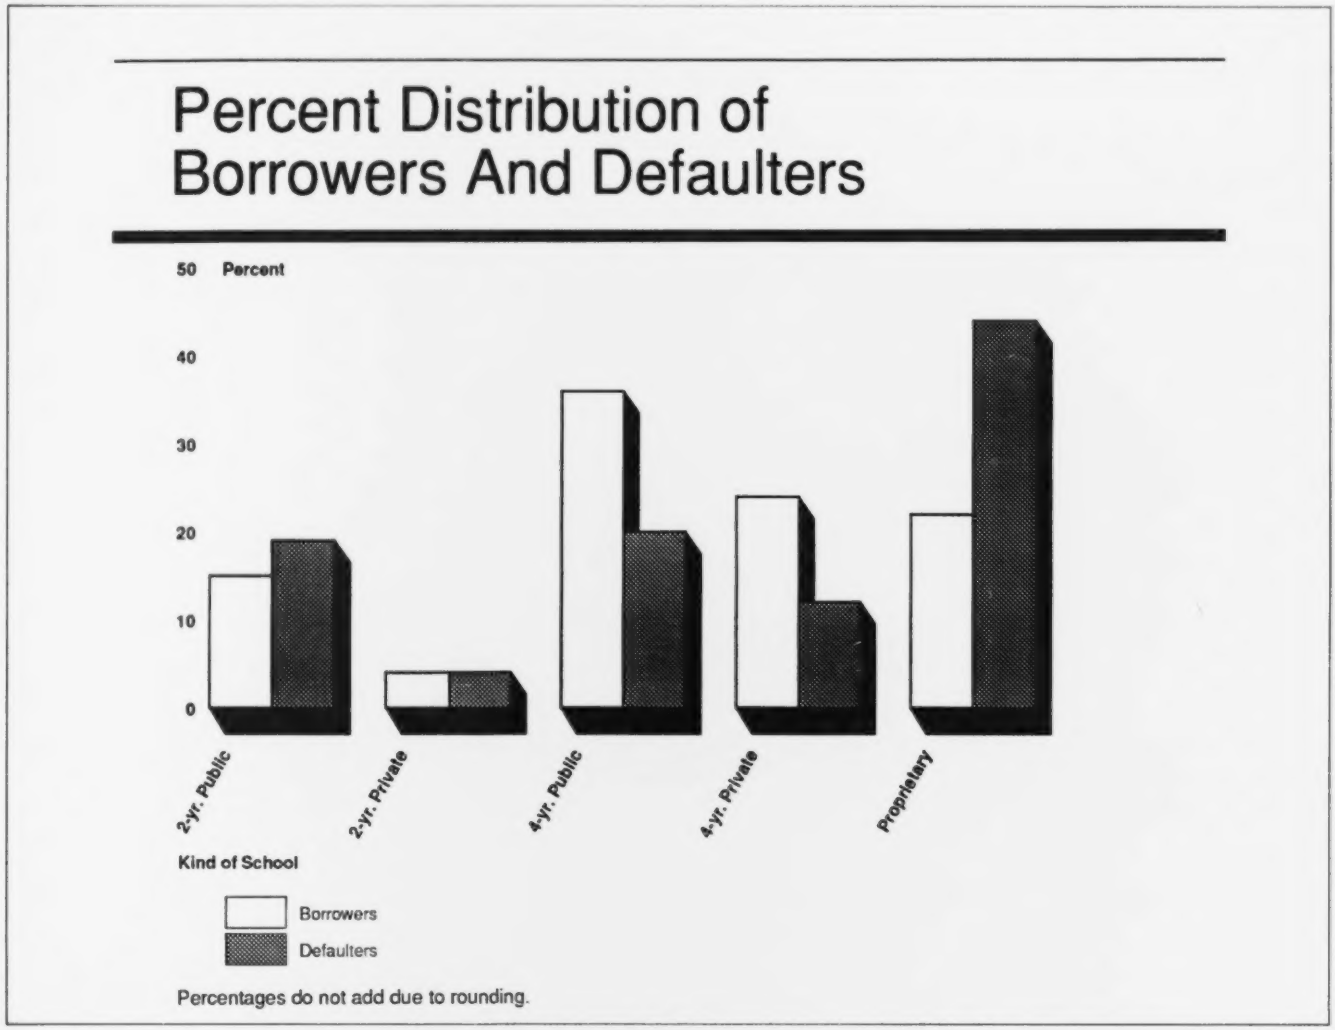

Figure 6 shows that 4-year public school borrowers received the highest percentage of cumulative loan dollars disbursed (39 percent) and 2-year private school borrowers received the lowest percentage of cumulative loan dollars (4 percent).

Figure 7 shows that 4-year private and public school students had the lowest dollar default rates (8 and 9 percent, respectively) and 2-year public and proprietary school students had the highest dollar default rates (21 and 34 percent, respectively).

Figure 8 shows that in our universe, 2-year public and proprietary school borrowers had a greater proportion of cumulative loan dollars in default (17 and 36 percent, respectively) when compared to their proportion of cumulative loan dollars received (11 and 14 percent, respectively).

Borrower Default Rates for Each School

Appendix I lists the borrower default rate for each school included in our analysis. After providing your offices with preliminary information in September 1988, we agreed to provide for each school its (1) name and location, (2) borrowers' rate of default, (3) dollar amount of loans in default, and (4) number of defaulters. We agreed to list all schools in our universe having at least one borrower. In analyzing this information, we found that over 1,200 schools had a borrower default rate greater than 40 percent. (See fig. 9.)

However, figure 10 shows that the vast majority of the schools listed had less than 25 defaulters. For example, more than half of the schools (671) having a student default rate greater than 40 percent also had less than 25 defaulters.
